Dr. Cook’s research focuses primarily on medieval and Renaissance music theory and performance, specifically on the development of musical notation in both music manuscripts and theoretical treatises between the thirteenth and sixteenth centuries. She is currently working on a new critical edition of the treatise “De arte cantus” by Johannes Pipudi, as well as a monograph exploring the development of notation in the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries.

She also maintains active research interests in popular and contemporary music, especially on music as a means of creating identities in television, film, and video games; the history of the Sistine Chapel Choir; and the role of music in religious worship, particularly in medieval, early modern, and American Christian traditions.
